However, as the title of the EIU’s 2013 “Baltic Report” suggests, it focuses mostly on the Baltic countries, not the United States, and on its own, not the United States either. Even more important, the views of the EIU and many other economists on Russia — its leadership, its state budget, its economy, its culture, its corruption, and many other subjects — are largely the product of a foreign-policy agenda, rather than one based on rational analysis and sound economics. The result, of course, is that many economists — whether intentionally or unintentionally — are not only underestimating the challenges the United States faces and the consequences of the policies to be pursued in response, but are actually helping to worsen them. The idea that the American economy has been in a mild recession since the middle of 2008 — or that the United States has not experienced a recession at all — is one that has been embraced by a number of prominent economists, and by many politicians, including the president and the leading presidential candidates. This view is contradicted not only by the government’s own financial statistics — which, for example, show unemployment going up even as the economy is supposedly growing — but by the U.S.’s current account deficit, which is the difference between how much the United States spends than it earns abroad.
