ReidQ: Are  $f(x) = 2x + 2$ ,  $f(x) = \frac{1}{x}$ ,  $f(x) = 1$  different functions This question is from Undergraduate Analysis by John Greear. Are  $f(x) = 2x + 2$ ,  $f(x) = \frac{1}{x}$ ,  $f(x) = 1$  different functions? I believe that all three of these functions are different as  $f(0) = 0$  and  $f(x) = f(\frac{1}{x})$  Am I correct? A: Your arguments are good. I like to put functions like these in the set  $\mathcal{F}$  of all functions  $f(x)$  which satisfy  $f(0) = 0$  and  $f(x) = f(\frac{1}{x})$ . If you want, you can think of that set as being  $\mathbb{R}$ , but that's up to you. The functions you are given are in  $\mathcal{F}$  because they satisfy these requirements. If you want, you could also take this set to be all functions  $f(x)$  which are continuous at  $x=0$  and  $f(x) = f(\frac{1}{x})$  as well. This set is also equivalent to  $\mathbb{R}$  with the standard topology. A: You're correct that all three functions are different. If you want to define the set  $\mathcal{F}$  of functions  $f$  for which  $f(0) = 0$  and  $f(x) = f(\frac{1}{x})$
