C-reactive protein (CRP) is associated with postpartum depression and low maternal sense of control. Postpartum depression (PPD) is a common and under-diagnosed complication of childbirth, which has serious consequences for mother, infant, and family.

Inflammation has been associated with depression. The objective of this study was to test the association between C-reactive protein (CRP) and PPD symptoms and its related factors. This was a cross-sectional study. A cohort of 80 pregnant women, including 30 with PPD, was recruited from the local prenatal care unit at a maternity hospital in Peru. Inflammatory markers (CRP, IL-6, TNF- α), anxiety, depression, and PPD symptoms were assessed. CRP was positively associated with PPD and its components (anxiety, depression, and sleep problems). CRP was positively associated with low self-efficacy and maternal-infant attachment. CRP was not associated with women's report of mother-infant attachment. CRP was not associated with anxiety, depression, or PPD. CRP was positively associated with PPD symptoms. It was negatively associated with maternal-infant attachment and self-efficacy.

Pages Sunday, August 29, 2013 Running out of space... It feels strange to know that I will be out of house and home in less than a week. My husband and I bought the house over a year ago now. It was the "dream home", so we had no idea what we were getting ourselves into
