But if a new study in Journal of Experimental Social Psychology is accurate, the wave of fake news has taken on a vicious new twist: manipulating people's emotions to draw them into actively seeking out more information that supports the purveyor's narrative, even if that information is not true. It's not that anyone is forcing these "news" stories, per se; they are embedded in social media, where likes and comments are rewards. And it doesn't hurt that these kinds of stories often pop up alongside photo streams and status updates from people who are just dying to be recognized and liked. The researchers tested how social media users responded to different types of messages. Fake news was the first, of course, and was made up of pro-Trump posts circulating on Reddit, including dozens of false stories from various sites. Another fake news type tried to generate clicks; it offered a clickable link with a text overlay of a Hillary Clinton quote that prompted people to click on the link. The last fake-
