Both coefficients demonstrated stronger agreement with the self-perceived demand at T1, with a lower predicted probability of reporting willingness to hire for a dental research position at T2. Neither of the coefficients showed an association between self-perceived demand and willingness to hire for a clinic position at T2, though the p-value for self-perceived demand was near the significance threshold. Both coefficients showed no statistical evidence of an association between self-perceived demand and willingness to participate at any time. Discussion {#sec007} ===== The results of this study demonstrate that the satisfaction and self-perceived demand for dental research roles differ between positions. Those individuals working in a research environment---either from a clinic or university-based position, or perhaps even in a private practice---were significantly less likely to want to be interviewed for a research position as compared to those individuals working in a clinical position.
