A CAD program is a drawing, design, or simulation tool that is used to create a 2D or 3D representation of a design. In the CAD world, drawings are referred to as blueprints, but the term can be confusing. While a blueprint is a blueprint that is used to create a blueprint for a building, a blueprint is a set of drawings that is used to create a design. CAD programs enable designers to create and edit models, which include geometric objects and 3D drawings. For example, a CAD program enables designers to create floor plans, elevations, interior and exterior perspectives, and architectural design blueprints. CAD programs enable architects to create building designs, and are useful for conceptualizing, developing, and preparing the documentation required for the design, construction, and documentation of buildings. CAD programs are used by engineers and technicians to design mechanical equipment. CAD programs are also used for generating design models, animations, and videos. Since the development of CAD programs, people have used a variety of tools and methods to draw and edit these drawings. Most CAD programs have some type of CAD model to draw on. The most common types of models include simple 2D drawings, 3D models, and 2D and 3D animations. CAD programs also offer many predefined tools to create drawings and models such as axonometric, full-paraline, and orthographic views. CAD programs are divided into three main categories: desktop, web, and mobile apps. The desktop version of CAD programs is the most common version of the software. Desktop CAD programs enable you to open multiple drawings and use multiple windows to edit drawings. CAD programs designed for the web and mobile apps are browser-based. These programs are downloadable as web apps or mobile apps. For example, a web-based CAD program can be accessed from any computer on the internet. With desktop CAD programs, you can access files stored on your computer's

Iran and six other world powers began negotiations over the nuclear deal in 2013. However, in May 2018, Trump withdrew the U.S. from the deal. In June 2018, Iran announced that it would resume all enriching uranium production and would scale back its uranium enrichment to a level below the 5% cap. The U.S. lifted sanctions and is still enforcing the 2015 deal. "If we are looking for an 'other solution,' then we can take this deal and scrap it," Zarif said in a recent interview with the BBC. "It would be a real shame if they decided to scrap the JCPOA – Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action – based on a fantasy," Zarif said. "It was a great thing for the world – it saved the world from a major war." Zarif said Trump's move was "a decision based on envy." "The president of the United States said 'I'm not going to let this go. And there is only one way to do it. I'm going to destroy the deal,'" Zarif said.
