In a previous question, I asked about the use of global variables on a system. My questions are: is there a reason to keep global vars in memory as opposed to having them in a file? is there a benefit of having them in memory? A: If your application is not multi-threaded, the only benefit of having it in memory is that it is a memory efficiency improvement. If it is single threaded, then having it in memory has no benefit over a file. Aside from memory efficiency, there is another benefit: you can modify it from your tests and have your test suite use it. This is an excellent idea, particularly if you use RSpec. You could have things like this in your test suite: VARIABLE = "hello" def test_something_yum assert_equal "world", VARIABLE end The above test will fail if VARIABLE is not set to "hello", since it uses the global variable to get that value. Of course, instead of having a global variable, you could just initialize it to have a different value, but that might get confusing, since it is unlikely that the name of the variable will change. While there isn't much of a reason to initialize it at runtime, there is a benefit to doing that, and you could do it: module VARIABLES def initialize @variable = "hello" end end VARIABLES.new #=> # That way, you don't have to worry about variables that are only used in tests, nor do you have to worry about letting tests with the same name override each other's variables. 1cb139a0ed
