I was a pre-adolescent when I first started baking. I was too young to realize that there was a difference in what I would call "cooking" and "baking". But, my mother loved to bake, so I loved to help. The first thing that really stuck in my young mind was butter cream frosting, in place of frosting. At the time, I didn't realize that it wasn't the frosting I was supposed to be frosting. It just looked like frosting and tasted like frosting, so I kept doing what I was doing. Now, I was baking and frosting cakes and pies. So, I didn't even realize that there were other things that could be done in the kitchen. Later, the daughter of a friend of my mother's, really got into making her own frosting. She used egg yolk as the frosting and I was extremely impressed. I thought, "This is it!" I had to take this recipe that I had been using for years and re-work it to make a "baking" recipe. I decided that I would change the ingredient list. I would keep the icing on top and that became the custard butter cream frosting. From there, I thought that I could make brownies, maybe even a cake, so, I tested out several recipes for brownies. It's a good thing that I did. Were you conscious of your measurements? I think that I was, but you are always conscious of your ingredients. As you start, you get to know what you want to use the most. I wanted to do something new, and original. My goal was not to repeat myself. I wanted to make something that was not the same as the ones I used before. I wanted it to be something new. I wanted to use a butter that would not break down as it would break down in the typical baking custard. I wanted to use something other than the traditional chocolate or vanilla. Does baking have to be a science? I think that there is no science to baking. It is just mixing things together until you get the consistency that you like. I think that experimenting is the key. Baking is just a
