For a player that just finished his fourth year in the league, and is coming off a season in which he had 1,307 rushing yards and another 365 receiving yards, getting the franchise tag is the last thing he needs to worry about. Coming off a season where he was second in the NFL in rushing touchdowns (19) and first in yards from scrimmage (1,607), Bell is on track to have a career year next season. But if he does, he'll almost certainly miss the first two games of the season thanks to the franchise tag. In the meantime, running backs will continue to receive the majority of the carries, while Bell will do all he can to rest his injury-riddled body for the playoffs and beyond. But the contract negotiations with the Steelers will almost certainly be a long, drawn-out process, one that could last as long as 16 months. By that time, Bell will have missed 20 to 25 games in a season, as well as the first two games of the regular season. And that's not even mentioning Bell's holdout last year, which resulted in him missing six games — four regular season and two playoff games. But as 3e33713323
