Selections In Photoshop, selections are the primary way to create boundaries for shapes. You can make selections through the GUI or using keyboard shortcuts. The key to making successful selections is patience and practice. After learning the ropes, you'll want to develop your own personal methods. Selections can be made from multiple parts of an image, and they can also be of sub-images or of entire images in a document. There are a few key points to keep in mind when using selections to create and work with them: There are all these selections in all of these layers. When you change a setting on one selection, the setting changes for all selections. Make sure that you select a single selection and then adjust its settings. It is impossible to select the same part of an image more than once. Selecting the same part of an image only selects the part of the image and not what's behind it. Objects can be selected using mouse clicks, but you can also use the keyboard shortcuts, or move your mouse to select parts of an object using the selection tool's polygonal selection method. You can divide a selection or simply choose to ignore the selection's outside bounds. You can do so via the current selection, via the undo feature, or via the selection's bounding box. The bounding box is the selection area. You can group selections. When you group selections, they will become one selection, which you can then scale, move, or otherwise manipulate to your heart's content. When you have multiple layers, it is often easier to work with selections on that layer instead of all layers. One of the most common tools to use in Photoshop is the selection tool. The tool works in either of two ways: using the polygonal selection tool that can be used for nearly all selections, or using the lasso tool, which is special for making selections around an object. The polygonal selection tool works in a similar manner to the Magic Wand (see the next section for more information about the Magic Wand and its differences from the Polygonal Selection Tool). Both tools can select objects by clicking in the image, with the Polygonal Selection Tool selecting the area within the specified parameters. The polygonal selection tool must be clicked in a similar fashion to the Magic Wand to select objects. Click on an area of an image, and you will see the object highlighted in the main area of

Layer Styles Layer styles allow you to add special effects to layers. For example, you can add shadows, a drop shadow, a stroke, a blend, a bevel, a glow, a reflection, a reflection gradient, a gradient blend, a gradient bevel, a gradient stroke, a gradient drop shadow, a pattern, a pattern overlay, a pattern reflection, a gradient pattern, a pattern glow, a drop shadow gradient, a shadow gradient, a shadow drop shadow, a shadow or a reflection outline. The outline is specified by an anchor point and a line width. > Figure 1. Layer styles. You can view all layer styles in the Layers panel. As shown in Figure 1, the layer styles are grouped into six categories: > Figure 2. Customizing layer styles. Photoshop layers are created in three different states. When you create a new layer, it is in the default state, Edit state, which is the default state. When you edit the content of a layer in Edit state, it is in the default state. You can change the layer's state to any of the other states. In Figure 2, you can see that the watercolor layer is currently in Edit state. The watercolor layer is in default state by default. To make the text layer appear like a watercolor layer, you can change its state from default to Edit and select the layer's color tool. You can change the appearance of a layer by editing the layer styles. As shown in Figure 2, a layer style is a set of properties. For instance, the blend layer style has two features: The Blend Type property specifies how the blend will be applied to the layer. The Blend Type can be one of the following: > Layer Type can be one of the following: > > > Brush: > Eraser: > Watercolor: > Shadow > > Drop Shadow > > Gaussian Blur > > Glow > > Bevel > > Gradient > > Reflection > > Pattern: You can manipulate layer styles to change the way that the layer appears. > For example, you can add a drop shadow to the wave layer. > Figure 2 shows how to create a drop shadow layer style for the watercolor layer. Surgical and healthcare costs for Brazilian acute myeloid leukemia patients with age-adjusted HLA-mismatched allogeneic hematopoietic stem cell transplantation are lower than those for age-adjusted matched transplant. Haploidentical transplant is a cost-effective alternative to matched donor transplant but its use is limited by donor availability and treatment related mortality. We investigate the value of using HLA-mismatched allogeneic stem cell transplant (MSCT) to treat acute myeloid leukemia (AML) and compare it with matched donor MSCT. A cost-effectiveness analysis comparing costs and outcomes of patients who received HLA-mismatched allogeneic MSCT and HLA-matched (Matched) MSCT. Data from prospective trials comparing matched and mismatched MSCT in AML were obtained. Outcomes of interest were: (i) survival, (ii) time-to-remission and (iii) cost of treatment. Mean costs were estimated as US$49,573 per patient for HLA-mismatched and US$63,495 for matched MSCT, and survival differences were significant for both costs and outcomes. Median costs were US$36,430 per patient for HLA-mismatched and US$49,133 for matched MSCT and median survival was 29.3 months for mismatched and 29.4 months for matched patients. Mismatched patients had lower mean costs per event and the results were significant for survival, time-to-remission and costs. Age-adjusted HLA-mismatched MSCT has important potential to provide an alternative cost-effective treatment for AML in Brazil, with costs lower than matched MSCT.OTTAWA—A half-dozen parents of young children were horrified to discover their kids were being given edible treats as "birthdays" at a public elementary school. Distroscale The parents first saw the children in class with their teachers on Nov. 15. The original secret Santa-themed party was a success, with the children keeping the treats in their lunchboxes for the rest of the year. "It was fine," said one mother, who asked to remain anonymous to protect the anonymity of the children. But about a month later the parents say they first noticed some kids were bringing the treats home. They were mostly chocolate-covered strawberries, mini M&Ms and spaghetti balls. They
