Haplotype analysis of recombination hotspots and genetic polymorphisms for the pericentromeric regions on chromosome 4p and 5q and risk of breast cancer. Breast cancer is a heterogeneous disease with several distinct molecular subtypes. The pericentromeric regions on chromosome 4p and 5q are genetically unstable, with frequent copy number changes, and exhibit the highest level of genome instability. We hypothesized that these common regions are involved in the etiology of breast cancer, and therefore undertook haplotype analysis of these regions to evaluate their role in breast cancer risk. We evaluated 7 single-nucleotide polymorphisms (SNPs) at four loci, four in 4p and three in 5q, and two different tumor DNAs from 184 subjects (107 with breast cancer and 77 without breast cancer). A high-risk haplotype at 4p16.3 was significantly associated with breast cancer risk (P = 0.013). Additionally, breast cancer subtype (hormone-receptor positive/negative, or HER2-positive
