1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to the field of laser lighting, and, more particularly, to a system for producing a light beam having a frequency selective output.
2. Description of the Prior Art Reflection of a laser light beam by an object causes the reflected beam to have a wide angular range of directions. The angular range is determined by the characteristics of the reflective surface, and is not easily controlled with a viewing mirror. For example, a beam emanating from a laser source and reflected by a viewing mirror located at a normal, perpendicular, 90.degree. angle to the longitudinal axis of the laser source will illuminate a fan-shaped angular region extending generally at a 90.degree. angle to the longitudinal axis of the source. A beam reflected from a diffuse reflector, such as white paint, has a fan-shaped angular illumination region extending at a lesser angle than 90.degree.. The amount of illumination of the intended target is thus reduced. Laser sources produce a beam that is narrowly
